

America's founding fathers gave the later generations of their country a lot of privileges. This includes freedom, education, opportunities, and many more. We don't appreciate them as much as we should.

One of America's gifts to my generation is freedom. Freedom is the gift of being able to do whatever we want, except something that is illegal, of course. The first amendment is an article that expresses these freedoms, an article that people like George Washington and Ben Franklin wrote. Freedom is a privilege that allows us to pick our own names, pick our own jobs. The only problem is freedom comes at a price.

Education is a gift that America gives from long ago. The education in the United States is in the top 15 from around the world. The education that America offers is free ranged. You get to chose if you want to go to a private school or a public school and that is a very valuable gift from America.

The right of security is very precious, and it is so unnoticeable that we, as Americans don't even realize it is there until it is gone. Security is the right of privacy, and it is what gives us protection from the dangers of the outside world, but sometimes security doesn't always work. Still, it is a much appreciated gift of Americans.

The opportunities of America are almost endless. We have so many opportunities and we consume them almost effortlessly. We have the opportunities to go to school and study to be what we wish, or the opportunities to be a true American. We have the opportunities to be what we wish when we grow up.

These gifts from our founding father and past generations are priceless, and they are not as valued as much as they should be. These are the gifts that I found most valuable to my generation. America the beautiful gave me a lot to be thankful for.
